He did not reach her and it would have mattered little if he had, for after getting clear of the Larnaca she sank about thirty yards distant, having a large hole punched in her sade.

We could do nothing to save the doomed men, for no common boat could have lived in that sea, and we had to quickly get snother anchor out, for we were drifting into the Goodwin Sands.

Of the whole crew of the ill-fated British Nay, only the second mate and two of the whole crew of the in-rated British Navy, only the second mate and two men, who clambered aboard our vessel during the collision, were saved. The others, and also our men who made that inopportune jump, met the seaman's fate.

Saved by a Mysterious Light. In 1883 I took passage on the steam Westmoreland bound for Baltimore. Midnight found us out on the bosom o benind a dark cloud, the wind blew furiously, the thunder roared, the lightfuriously, the thunder roared, the light-ning flashed and the boat was thrown first on one side and then on the other. Each moment spoke of the awful doom that awaited us, and everyone was peti-tioning their Divine Father for help, when suddenly an image in the shape of a man and as white as snow appeared on the water about five hundred feet away, surrounded by a bright light about two hundred feet in circumference. surrounded by a bright light about two hundred feet in circumference.

On the inside of the line of light was calm. The captain attered for it, and when we were within its bounds we anchored. Outside was the roaring sea that seemed to reach the skies.

Soon the white image vanished, the light disappeared, the noon shone again and the bay was quiet. Orders were given to taken in the anchor, and we were soon sailing safely over the deep waters.

We reached Baltimore about 4 o'clock A. M., all safe and happy. Baltimore.
